For the Bultimore Clipper. WOMAN. BY J. W. LCGEFREEL M. D.

Twas said by one who knew life's sorrows well, That Eden's rosy bower was all a wild; That joy and happiness could never dwell Within man's breast, till lovely woman smiled.

Although kind Nature had bestowed on him The richest blessings from her bountcons store; Yet still there was an aching void within-He sighed that Nature had bestowed no more.

Mor was it till the God of Nature said It is not good for man to be alone, That the dark clouds which o'er the garden spread, Dispersed, and light around man's pathway shone.

And not e'en now can earthly wealth bestow That bliss for which we toll and pant and moan-Man's happiness is incomplete below, If left to room through this wide world alone.

In vain we climb the rugged steeps of fame, In hope that we may find contentment there: Tis nought though thousands swell with joy our name, If we have none with as that name to share.

I envy not the man who seeks to find, Away from woman's calm, bewitching smile, Some other charm on which to fix be inind. And all his fond affections to begunt, & Fr

Though others glory in their pomp and show, Though they in luxury and splendour bask; No other earthly bliss I wish to know,

Than woman's love-no other boon I ask. GEORGETOWN, D. C.

THE FANNY-STRUCK FRENCHMAN. The following from the N. O. Picayune is too good to be kept from the numerous acquaintance of Miss Fanny in this city:

Julien Dumurier, a native of la belle France, was brought before the Recorder at the instance of the lady with whom he boards, Mrs. Janson, house, and annoying her other boarders.
