AUVERSITY AND PROSPERITY. It has been ! declared that one of the most interesting objects in nature is "a brave man struggling against the etorms of Fate." The interest excited in this case arises from the impression that it requires extraordinary moral fortitude to enable a man to enstain himself in the depths of adversity-and it is undoubtedly true, that misfortune is too often attended by despondency, if not despair.-Some persons, on slight reverses of fortune, relinquish exertion and deem it impracticable to recover their former position. This exhibits a weak mind and an unconfiding heart: for that which we consider missortune, not unfrequently proves to be of the greatest advantage. If the mind he properly disciplined and the man be duly impressed with his responsibilities, he will passes an intellectual clasticity which will enable him to bear up against adversity, and to overcome obstacles which are apparently insurmountable. We admire the individual who, if his house be burned to-day, is seen clearing away the rubbish to-morrow; for he exhibits a fortitale which must insure his success, and sets an example which may be of advantage. Another in his situation, and destitute of proper energy, would sigh over his misfortune, and, perhaps, seek to bury the recollection of it in intoxication. How often is misfortune offered as the apology tor intemperance-and it is because so many yield cuder slight pressure, that he who encounters selversity with a manly spirit becomes an object of admiration.

It has been supposed by moralists that the disthan in prosperity; but we think this doubtful .-In adverse circumstances we are apt to assume rely upon honorable labor. Interest and comfort combine to keep us in an even course, and it requires no great exertion of fortitude to prevent our deviating. Having never tred "the flowery paths" of the wealthy, the propensities of our nature bare lain dormant-and we fancy ourselves strong, because we are untried. A bad man, under such eireumstances, may more through life, without eliciting much of censure or observation. If we would desire to know the true character of an individual we must place him in prosperitygive him wealth and power. It is in this situation that his latent feelings will be brought into action; and here we shall have the true test of his disposition. We think it more difficult to bear prosperity than adversity, with equanimity (-for the inclination is too general, when we "feel power" to "forget right." We have known many who, having slowly and humbly crawled to the nighest round of the ladder, have instantly kicked the dirt off their feet into the eyes of these who assisted in their elevation.
