persons to apologize for omissions of duty by pleading want of time. They promise them-... selves, that at a future day they will have more leisure, and therefore postpose to "a more con-, ?wenient season" what should be done at once .--There are few individuals who have not been guilty of this censurable procrastination. We have known those who had furnished themselves] with valuable books, and yet never read a volmane—for want of time. But these same men we have seen idle for hours together. The journey of life is too short to misapply time. Al men who have attained distinction have had to " labor diligently in their vocation.
