The writer has furnished to the editor the names of the parties implicated, with permission to publish them together with his own, which shows that he is confident of being able to sustain the charges made, either before the public or a jury. The commissioners will doubtless sift this nefarious business to the bottom, but it is not so certain that the culprits will be punished. They have no doubt influential friends, whose delicate feelings might be wounded by a public prosecution, and who will manage to have proceedings arrested. This has been the usual course, and will not, probably, be deviated from in the present instance. If, however, there should be one poor devil amongst them, "whose poverty and not his will consented" to the robbery, he may look out for the vials of wrath to be emptied upon his head. What monstrous perversion of justice—what a mockery is it to have laws professing to deal with all the poor.

If the parties charged be actually guilty, we | hope that they will be punished, if it be only for the novelty.

The truth is, appointments to office have been made with too little reference to moral character, which ought to be a matter of primary consideration.
