For the Baltimore Clipper. Oh, ye whose days as yet are few, Let not the chosen moments fly, But Wisdom's happy path pursue,

And learning grasp, ere age is nigh. Thy labors here no same shall win, Nor thou respect with men obtain, Unless with youth thou shalt begin The treasures of the mind to gain.

The days are past, when strength and skill, Or courage in the ranks of war, Manhood's meed of praise would fill, Or spread his glories from afar.

The days are gone, when heaps of gold, And garments of a thousand dies, A mortal's name would leave enroll'd Upon his nation's histories.

Now the feeblest hand can sway A mightier wand than that of kings; The sceptre bade the form obey—

The pen the mind obedient brings. And learning is not hard to find, If sought with true and heartfelt zeal; Then seek her, and thy opening mind Her power and peace shall early feel.
