Oh, ye whose days as yet are few, Let not the chosen moments fly, But Wisdom's happy path pursue, And learning grasp, ere age is nigh.

Thy labors here no same shall win, Nor thou respect with men obtain, Unless with youth thou shalt begin The treasures of the mind to gain.

The days are past, when strength and skill, Or courage in the ranks of war, Manhood's meed of praise would fill, Or spread his glories from afar. The days are gone, when heaps of gold,

And garments of a thousand dies, mortal's name would leave enroll'd Upon his nation's histories. Now the feeblest hand can sway

A mightier wand than that of kings; The sceptre bade the form obey-The pen the mind obedient brings.

And learning is not hard to find, If sought with true and heartfelt zeal; Then seek her, and thy opening mind Her power and peace shall early feel.

> From the Saturday Evening Post. WHAT MAKES A BEAUTY? BY SKETCHER.

"And so, Frank, you will have none other than a beauty for your wife?"

never call me husband. No! she to whom I give my hand must possess something more than that -nay, a good deal more." "Inde ed!"

"Yes-indeed. She must have features the as the driven snow; eyes as dark and sparkling as lips finely chiselled and ruby red; and a form, tall, and stately as that of the Gazelle."

"Ha, ba, ha! Methinks, my good friend Frank that you will have to search in the world of romance for your sweetest of life," you will find it a somewhat hard matter to come across such a one in the sphere of realities." "If I do not, then I will never marry."

"Pshaw! you will not, ch?" "No, I will not."

"Then you do not believe that a woman can be charming, and not possess Gazelle eyes, ruby lips, and so forth!-that an intelligent and cultivated with his eyes rivetted upon her. mind can beautify, and light up the common place i features until they become bewitching-that au amiable temper and good heart, can surround her eyes upon her. with a loveliness more irresistable than the most exquisite personal charms?" "I do not."

"I once believed so myself, Frank, and yet you | know my wife's beauty is not of the most glaring description. I would wager almost any thing that, like your hemble servant, you will marry a woman of ordinary personal attractious, after all your assertions to the contrary." "Never, Ned."

"Well, we'll see in time. I was going to ask] you to go with me to-night, that I might introduce you to a witching little fairy, whom I had set | an angel-a queen of beauty." my heart upon getting you to marry. But it's of no use now. You would'nt look at her. Alas! for my first attempt at match making! Good

The above was a conversation between two young men, Frank Chesterton and Edward Carrol, bosom friends. They were both men of fortune The latter was, as we have seen, married; his wife, as he expressed it, did not possess personal "beauty of the most glaring description," yet was he rich in her, for she possessed that higher merit, beauty of mind. The former was single. Many a young lady of his acquaintance -and some of them too, who were accounted lovely-would have been glad to have called the handsome Frank Chestertou, husband. But none of them, however dazzling, approached his exalted notions of beauty. They all alike appeared | to him common place. Why was this? It was a question he had never fully considered, and theretere, answering himself at random, concluded that ed person." it was want of more perfect contour of features, instead of a more beautiful expression—a more pleasing countenance—the loveliness of which seems to depend upon the aweetness of the mind. A few evenings after the foregoing conversation Frank went to a party at the house of a lady of the first circle in societs, named Mrs. Roland .-Many were the bright glances shot from sparkling my wife's little coz. So come on: we will attend eyes toward him, but he gave no more attention than what politeness required. He was not cold, or uncivil, for urbanity was natural to him, but he naid his attentions in such a manner, that they ing them homeward. could not be mistaken for aught more than those of friendship. Having a kind word and a warm smile for each, he glided from one to the other, in love you will know all about them, and if you beaux at the upper apartment. He could not see who it was they surrounded, but just then he heard will briefly say that in a twelvementh or so, suba merry peal of loughter ring out from within the circle. The tone was of ailvery sweetness, and he involuntarily stopped to listen. At that inerant his hosters approached him, and perceiving this same Mr. Frank Chesterton having become his excious look, asked if wished an introduction to the lady, who, as she termed it, the bery of gentlemen was "monopolising." He assented, and at a word from Mrs. Roland the circle opened, and disclosed to Frank's view a vision of loveliness, such as he had never beheld, in the shape of a voung girl, apparently about nineteen years of
