Oh! strike those magic chords again, And let them on the night breeze swell, Their gentle numbers doth enchain Each thought, and sense, with potent spell.

You may not know what seelings throng This heart of mine—how dear they are— What witching pow'r is in each song, That floats upon your "light Guitar."

But touch the chords, while all a-round So soft and still-at midnight's hour, When not a harsh, discordant sound Of noise, or strife, disarms their power.

And I will list, while pulses thrill, And deep emotions crowd my breast, And when they cease, will linger still On the sweet language they express'd.

STANZAS. Oh! songs there are than that more gay, And some sweetly sad perchance; Airs that drive all care away, That well befit the sprightly dance; And such I'll sing and play for thee, But do not ask that song from me.

He loved to hear me sing it, when His youthful heart was all my own, And with its words return again The thought that I am now alone, The mail he loves will sing for thee

The seng thou canst not hear from me. ELLEN. From the Ladies' Companion for June.
