The Battle in Mobile Bay.

From the New Orleans papers of the 10th we cut the following in reference to Farragut's late sight in the Mobile Bay: The U.S. steamer Tennessee, Acting Master George E. Nelson commanding, arrived late ported that some of our men were recaptured

The destruction of this vessel was at first ! somewhat of a mystery, but we are new enabled to lay before our readers an authentic account of her destruction. Her captain, who was attempting to accomplish a feat! which, if it had been successful, would have immortalized his name and formed a bright chapter in the annals of the naval history our country, was lost in attempting to rur the gauntlet half an hour later than the fleet. When opposite the fort the guns opened upon her, and in three fathoms water she attempted to turn back and run out again when she struck on a sand bar. The splendid artillery firing from Fort Morgan soon riddled her, piercing her boller, and completely disabling her. Two men were killed, another badly scalded, and one wounded. One shot passed in one door of the pilot house and out of the other, the house being empty at the to boats, with the wounded, and made for the Buckthorn, under a steady fire from Fort Morgan. Captain Beevers was urged to this ! daring feat by suggestions of officers in high rank, and if he had been successful in its accomplishment it would have afforded him glery enough for a lifetime. As it is, he has lost his vessel. Bhe was boarded and fired by the rebels from one of their gun-boats.
