Mr. Osborn (President of the Illinois Central Railroad) told me acatory of Admiral Parragut and his son. They were on the Mississippi, and Parragut's fleet was about to pals Port Hudson, which was then bell by the Confrierates. Farragut's son, a lai of about twelve, had been importuning his father that he might be sent to West Point, where the military endets are educated. Old Parragut said. "I don't know how that would do: I am not sure whether you would stand fire." "Oh, yes, father, I could do that "-Very well, my boy, we'll try; come up with me here." The Admiral and his son went up together into the maintop; the old man had hims if and the boy lashed to it, and in this way they passed Port Hudson. The bry never flicched while the shot and shell were tlying past him. "Very well, my boy, that will do:

you shall go to West Point. Of Grant, who new commands the Federal army before Richmond, he told me this:-In the first action in which Grant commanded, his troops at first gained a slight advantage over the Confederates.-They began to plumder the Confederate camp in spite of all that Grant could do to step them. At last Grant, who knew that Confederate reinforcements were coming up, got some of his triends to set fire to the camp, so as to stop the plundering.-Then he got his troops together as well as he could, and retreate It but in the meantime, the Confederate wint requerts came etheiently in his attempts to stop the plundering and collect his troops.
