In that brief period, crowded as it with a whole life-work of consecration to the Union, freedom and glory of his country, he not only commanded respect and reverence, but concentrated upon himself in a most remarkable degree the love of loyal and generous hearts. We have seen in these years of trial, very grea sacrifices offered upon the alter of patriotism, wealth, case, borne love, life itself. But Edward Everett did more than this he laid on the altar not only his time. talents and culture, but his pride of opinion his long cherished views of policy, his per sonal and political predilections and prejudices, his constitutional fastidiousness of conservatism, and the carefully elaborated symmetry of his public reputation. With a rare and noble magnanimity, he met, without hesitation, the demand of the great occasion.
