"The insolence of office" was proverbial even in Shakspeare's time, in fact, has been since ever the world recognized; such an agency as human government; and if the late war-we call it late since i has developed any one thing more rapidly than another, it is that offensive assumption by titled popinjays, the fungi of public offices, who, in the needs of a wholesale creation of places by the war, presume to suub and browbest all simple citizens who have occasion to approach Who does not rejoice when he knows that the approach of peace is to abate a nuisance getting to be so offensive; who does not remember this and that upstart who will be the better for setting back to the place he occupied before the war, before small heads became turned by some trifling elevation, comparatively, in the line of official dignities? How pleasant, too, it will be, to see the highways of the land shortly freed from the presence of swaggerers, who, if the war had lasted twenty years, would have somehow managed to keep away from "the front;" heroes who never smelled! villainous gunpowder, although assuming all the honors readily accorded by a grateful people to those who have?
