THE NATURE OF OUR TRIUMPH IN

ITS BEARING ON THE DEVICES OF

THE ENEMY.

In contemplating the results of the great conflict, here, the fruits of all the victories and self-denial and perseverance thrown into the scale to save the theory, as well as practice, of free government from destruction, the triumph gained at home, precious and desirable as it is, is only a part of the great and enduring benefit which has been secured for the nation, who have heroically borne the burden of the terrible struggle. We have the satisfaction of knowing that whilst there are those across the water who are keenly watching for the destruction of the Republic, for the first failure of the experiment of free government, that in sympathy with the patriotic and liberal minded here, men who may be said to form a community of mind, of intellectual and moral worth of themselves, who also have their reward for nobly standing by us in the darkest hours of the fight. A brave minority, a small band, comparatively, in the midst of the myriads of despotism in the old world, their faith in our power to eventually triumph has done something like the sublime as at all times, on every suitable occasion, they have championed our cause with tongue and pen.

The devotees of despotic government over there, certainly had their periods of exultation, of thorough confidence in our failure, and with every disaster to the good cause promptly lacerated from their side, they contemptuously made the most of

And who will ever forget the shrieks of exultation which disinters to the Federal cause, such as the scenes at Bull Ran, Fredericksburg, and numerous other points were received? When every arrivalment from the other side brought a new instalment of taunts and sneers from the London Times and Herald, and whilst the great reviews were being written of the situation here, when the triumph of the arms was made use of to inspire public sentiment in England to the last pitch of insolence that could possibly be tolerated, what brave constancy, we say, was displayed by the liberals of Europe in standing up for us amidst all this; and how gratifying is it to feel now, and
