A SECOND ROBINSON CRUSON. General Scott, in his interesting auto-| biography, gives an account of a Robinson Crusos, a Mr. Pain, who lived a solitary life of many years on the Island of Cape Breton. He says:

Mr. Pain sailed from Boston in a smack for the banks of Newfoundland and other fishing grounds in 1774, before the outbreak of the Revolution. Having made up the cargo in the Gut of Carso, Pain begged his companions to let him remain until the return of the party the following season. They assisted in building him a hut, and left him with a good supply of personal and bed clothes, ammunition, fishing tackle, and such other stores as could be spared, together with a Bible, "Paradise Lost" and the "Pilgrim's Progress." Prayers were said at parting and the smack sailed for home.

This was the last that our adventurer saw of "the human face divine" for nine or ten years. The Revolutionary war supervened. There was no more fishing and curing of tieb by Americans on those shores-the Gut of Canso not being navigated at that period except by vessels driven into it by the stress of weather -There was no road and no trail across the mountains to any settlement whatever. For the first year, and indeed till his supplies began to fail him. Mr. Pain, then young, did not lament his condition. But when the second and third seasons came, and again and again there was no return of his friends, it seemed evident that they had abandoned him; his spirits drooped, and he was in danger of being

But man is the most flexible and pliable of all animals. According to his own account, Mr Painbegan soon to relish food without salt: the deer and fleece goat were abundant, furnishing him with both food and raiment, and which he contrived to entrap after his powder and shot were exhausted. So, too, in respect to worn out hooks and lines; these were replaced by boxes and slips of skir, so that there was no want of the "finny prey." By the fifth year he began to like the new life as wel! as he did the first. His books were more than a soluce to him; and the autobiographer can testify that he could accurately recite from memory, entire chapters of the Bible, and many of the books of "Paradise

Figally, when, at the end of the war, his old master in a smack came in search of him or his remains, he had become so much attached to this new mode of existence that he refused to return to his native soil. A good supply of necessaries was again left with him. His little property at home was invested in cattle. with materials for a small house, some furniture, &c., all of which were sent out to him, with an older sister, and a farm laborer, and a lad-a relative. Before 1412 some new connections and laborers joined him, and he had become a thrifty
