is a matter of guess, but it can be nearly approximated. Our own merchants estimate it at 20,000 hogsheads. Of this about 10,000 hogsheads are in the hands of the planters in Virginia, Maryland, and in the possession of the planters in the country.

Now, it will be observed that this extract confirms a statement we made some time ago on the authority of those who were well posted in regard to matters there, to wit—that there was a large trade in reserves for Baltimore in this article, provided the over zealous conservators here of our interests did not drive it away by dealing too harshly with those who might seek to bring it back to our city.

Every horse in the country ought, if possible, to have a few bottles of this medicine or nursing can do as well.

Every one who has seen the crops which furnished the bulk of the crop of the rebellion, will be struck with the line of action, some thousands of bales having been stowed away in that city and brought to light when it was evacuated by the rebel forces.

It is a matter of fact that although the real cotton producing States—those which furnished the bulk of the crop—have suffered by raids here and there, the Federal troops, yet that in the west, after all, the most fertile soils are in the hands of the rebels.
