WHEN GREEN LEAVES COME AGAIN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JON MALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

"When green leaves come again my love,
We'll have such a cloudy face."

"When green leaves come again."

"May, like my faithful hymn, my sweet!"

"Green leaves come again,

"Green leaves come again,

"Green leaves come again."

"Ah! this spring will be like the last,

"And summer like winter's arms
Are green leaves come again."

"So little to me—so little care—
But still I have to know why,

"When green leaves come again."

"May, like my faithful hymn, my sweet!"

"Green leaves come again,

"Green leaves come again,

"Green leaves come again."

OLD AGE.

One will long to find a better description of extreme age than the following, written in the year 1600, by Native Poet:

"Of all the infirmities that die, he had,

Half consider'd at because he dropp'd no bones;

Fate seem'd to wind his up for fourscore

Years; he ran to ten winters more,

Till, like a clock, a went with beating

Time, when green leaves come again."

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

(Correspondence of the Baltimore Clipper.)

Washington, June 7, 1865.

Andrew Jackson and Andrew Johnson—The Era of Reform at Hand.

Thirty years ago, Andrew Jackson, in his memorable language, addressed delivered from the eastern parties of the capital, thus spoke on the cardinal distinctions of "economy and freedom from public debt":

"I shall aim at the observance of a strict and faithful economy the more anxiously, to ensure that it will facilitate the enlargement of the national debt—the necessary duration of which is incompatible with real independence."

Let us to public and private prosperity, which a profuse expenditure of money by the Government is but too apt to engender."

A few Juhana, himself a disciple of the Jackson school, and from the same State which was the home and is now the birthplace of the hero of the Hammer, is evidently animated by the spirit that dictated that noble declaration. If the condition of the country in 1839 called for the amelioration of practices that had grown up in the public service, much more emphatically may it now be said, in the great old soldier's own robust language, that "recent events insure on the list of Executive duties, in characters too liable to be overlooked, the task of reform."

At a recent meet referee that Mr. Johnson's character and conduct throughout his whole public career, and the strong and more satisfactory assurances that is will go far as the man who has gone far in correcting abuses, surging our sympathy by the past, cutting of all extravagant and useless expenditures, and introducing those requirements of purity and simplicity in every branch of the public service, to which our country owed its greatness in the older time; and the violation of which must inevitably produce a decline in everything that constitutes the true health and strength of a free government.

The return of peace strikes out of existence an enormous number of places hitherto at the disposal of Government, but will also multiply the avenues for the proper pursuit of peace, and increase the spirit of independence among all classes of people by the new opportunities afforded of gaining the rewards of tranquil industry and persevering application in those occupations which, in America, never fail to crown the laborer with the means of contented enjoyment. Once butting, it is to be hoped, it will be by a less prevalent position that it was holding, striking years of dead and deadly silence.

The condition of war and bloodshed—of camps and expeditions—and of anxiety about the result of the great struggle, will leave jealous and watchful guardians of purity and economy at full liberty and leisure to forest and exhibit for correction any malpractices or sources of public mischief. While engaged in expelling the rebellion, the enemies of the Union and the Grecians necessarily ingrained the chief attention of the truly patriotic and most energetic spirits that took part in affairs. Now, however, that the insurgents are put down, there may be good reason for looking into the framework of what is heretofore to be considered, and the violation of which must inevitably produce a decline in everything that constitutes the true health and strength of a free government.

AMUSEMENTS.

The Last Night But One.—The last performance but one this season will take place on Friday evening, June 11, at the Royal Hotel, Broad Street. The program, and with it the curtain, will be closed by a grand review of the "Grecian Army" of spectators, contractors, and favorites in every quarter.

It is not the least pleasure to view the progress of the great theater, as he is let into it. It illustrates rapidly, as far as their legitimate and regular contracts

—the leases that have been seeking the blood of the public will drop off, leaving it a fair chance for a speedy restoration to strength and popularity.
