SOME OF THE NATURAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE REBELLION AS SHOWN AT PRESENT IN THE SOUTH. All accounts concur in representing matters in the South generally as in a chaotic condition, now, and such will not present an aspect of order for a considerable period to come. Whilst the new relationships of the people down there to the Government are getting to be rapidly understood in the cities and large towns, the residents of more remote localities but slowly accept the situation, and give evidence that they will need to be locked closely after, if those bonds are to hold which have been generated by the war. The statement given in our last issue concerning affairs in Alabama, is perhaps a fair index of what will happen or is happening to a greater or less extent in other communities, where the returned rebel soldiers are taking occasion to visit upon their recent oppressors—the leading spirits of the rebellion—some of the woes they have experienced at their hands—The tyranny exercised towards those poor followers in conscripting them into the rebel army, to keep them there without pay, leaving their families to suffer and starve at home, is forcibly remembered now—Especially will those not forget it who, escaping from their military bondage in their anxiety to relieve their starving families, were hunted through the hills with dogs, torn back into the ranks remorselessly, whilst those who were the wreaths of the Richmond dynasty were on various pretenses allowed to be exempt from the hardships and perils of the battle-field.

An cause for particular dissatisfaction and anger, the "twenty negro exemption clause" is doubtless not forgotten in its bearings on the two classes; singling out the poor down there for sacrifice as it did, and rendering more realms in an evil cause those privileged to remain mere spectators of the fray. Had these "exempts" been less demonstrative in the past, they would fare better at present. But with the Confederacy driven to closer quarters as time wore on, and possessed with a lively sense of the fact that if the masses, the "poor whites" did not serve, they must, they lent themselves eagerly to force the latter back into the thinned ranks of the rebel army, Pillow's "Conscription Bureau," at Huntsville, while boasted of having gathered up "fifty thousand" of the doomed class, telling the terrible story of the extent of the tyranny perpetrated.

There is another fact that throws light on the present condition of things in Alabama, a contrast distinguished from some other portions of the South. North Alabama, like East Tennessee, was in the outset especially, determinedly Union in sentiment, and throughout the war it did what it could under the leadership of such men as the late Jerry Clemens, and Nick Davis to stand by the Union. With a good deal of territory in "barrens," dotted with small patches, and with a slaty hillside population, having little feeling in common with the cotton magnates of the middle and southern portions of the State, they had hoped to avoid being greatly complicated in the struggle. Athene in that portion of the State, the small farmers, and themselves liable to the merciless draft for the rebel armies, and their homes was a favorite recruiting or drafting ground for the rebel conscription officers. And for the manner in which the system worked, it is enough to say that as elsewhere, the men to carry it out were the other class—the rich. Cut-off in their ultimate success, arraigned, fearing of possible consequences, we have seen what they did; and we are now learning how fatal for their present and future peace has been their course. Visited heavily for their tyranny, their cruelty to their poor neighbors, the latter have come back, such of them as are left, bearing vengeance against the men who so mercilessly victimized themselves and their families. Uncovered at last to the vengeance purposes of these men, the class enraged called upon that government they contended and defied to protect them, to ward off the consequences of their own follies and crimes.

We say then, that all over the South, and to a greater or less extent, we may expect for a good while to come excesses to be heard of growing as an inevitable conclusion out of the former condition of things. Crime in this regard has begun to tenet. And what is directly reported of Alabama, is true to a very considerable extent of Northern Georgia and of the mountainous districts of the Carolinas, Virginia and Tennessee. And as in Louisiana and Mississippi,—indeed throughout the South—there are large sections technically termed "barrens" given over in the past to the growth of pines, scrub oaks and the inevitable "poor whites," and as these latter have been prepared by their drill masters by a schooling of four years for a life of illness and crime, left destitute for the present by the war, and maddened by their bereavements and losses, mortified too by their defeat, who does not see that it is going to take a great deal of watching and labor to keep such a population within proper bounds; to bring back the country to that condition of real peace and security that existed before the war?

And now aware of this, seeing that without any extorting, any further rebuke or punishment from the people of the loyal section, those who participated in the most attempt at revolutions are getting sufficiently punished, let all that can reasonably be done in the interest of humanity, be attempted to save the South from itself. Turn and distrusted by deadly curse, destitute, mortified, swept of the power of its population, surely it can need no further reasons as to the folly of resisting the General Government, because already by the condition of things we have described, they are learning that their best protection, their very salvation, politically, is the power of that Government. Rapidly learning this, they are already holding "Union meetings" to affirm their allegiance to the Government, even in Georgia; and every where as the evils we have indicated come closer home to them, will be found reaching out toward it as they never did before. To meet such a condition of things, the Government is demonstrating that it will not be remiss; and so let us hope that they are very long, the revolving section, chastened and taught right, will become what it should long since have become, one of the truest supporters of a really free government,

SPEECH OF JUDGE BLAIR. We give in to-day's issue the speech of Judge Blair on the "Monroe doctrine," delivered at Hagerstown yesterday. And if we have to say—that we regret to see a matter so fraught with the elements of fierce controversy agitated at this time, when the country so much needs peace—Believing fully in the "Monroe doctrine," we yet see no occasion for active measures to vindicate it at present; and we feel, that the country needs all the quiet it can command in order to recover from the deep wounds inflicted by the war just closed, and before it even debates the expediency or necessity of assuming a hostile front towards any. Nevertheless, as a speech that is destined to receive a good deal of attention from the public, we spread it before our readers—repeating the beliefs we entertain and have long since expressed—that the "Monroe doctrine" can't.
