A pyramid of ordinary champagne bottles was formed, which she ascended, sit lastant. at the top balancing a number of rotating plates on her face and hands. The feat was performed admirably, and was received with considerable applanae. Hav ing redressed she again appeared fully prepared to ascend the rope, which was stretched to a length of one hundred and ifty feet. A heavy shower of rain had slackened the rope considerably, which on its being tightened, broke. The assistants, however, spliced it, and Mile. De Vanier prepared to make the ascent. There is an extraordinary desire amongst the public to witness the performance of any perilous feat. Were it not that there was some chance of the performer falling and breaking his or her neck, who would care to see a rope ascension ! If the rope were three feet from the ground, though ! it required the same skill to balance oneself, still the risk would be less, and no one would care to see it. Nervous at first. the graceful performer gradually acquired more courage, and amid a breathless silence she ascended to the top. Then the inthusiasm of the crowd broke out, and cheer after cheer rent the air. In her wards went up during the day to 141%, but downward progress Mile.
