Houcks Mill is a two storey frame mill, four bays in length, two and one-half storeys in height. Its principal gable end, with doors into each storey, faces southeast, projecting into the alignment of the road, causing the orad to curve sharply around the mill. A hoist beam, cantilevered from the ridge, is sheltered by a projecting portion of the roof. Exterior walls are sheathed with corregated sheet metal. A wide entrance is centered on the wouthwest side, and windows, generally, are 6/6.

Internally, most of the milling apparatus has been removed. Walls and ceilings are unfinished; thus the entire structure is exposed. Principal members are joined by mortise and tenon with wood pins; a massive girder parallels the roof ridge under each floor, supported by two chamfered columns within each storey. All framing members are circular sawn; most nails are cut, although wire nails appear in the third storey. The character of the framing members does not suggest any major alterations.

Houck's Mill appears to have been built very late in the 19th century, or early in the 20th century. Its general form and construction are very traditional, because the structural fequirements of a small mill in that late period differed little from these of earlier periods.
